Most of them end up just being for aesthetic effects, but FabFilter Pro-G is still a very useful and transparent tool for making a really good sounding noise/ambient/drone track. I love its simplicity and ability to get things done without fiddling with knobs and buttons. And it's affordable! So it's a no-brainer for me. I think it would be really difficult to make something as good as Pro-G with the capabilities of a $1,000+ plugin. I've known some of FabFilters products over the years, but I haven't really liked anything I've tried up until now. The main problem I've had is that they are the type of plugins that are really intuitive to use, but don't provide a lot of flexibility in their routing and I really prefer a plugin that lets me do more. It has to be the most "basic" gate plugin I've ever used, but I've always heard that gates tend to sound a bit "tinny" or "strained" if they aren't set up correctly. I feel that Pro-G is the closest to the most basic setup of any plugin I've ever used. If you like to build things up by adding more "stuff" as you go along, Pro-G is the perfect plugin for you. As usual with FabFilter products, it's a matter of finding the right settings. For example, you might choose to use the "Sync" plugin for the sidechain, or to use sidechain volume, the overall output level, and
