gastric adenocarcinoma\[[@B8]\], suggesting its usefulness even in cases where histology is not available. Endoscopic mucosal resection was first described by Sakamoto et al\[[@B9]\] in 1993 for the treatment of superficial large esophageal leiomyomas, later introduced for treatment of large esophageal leiomyomas in 1994\[[@B10]\]. The technique involves two-piece endoscopic mucosal resection using a polypectomy snare. The resected tissue is examined under the microscope to ensure complete removal of the entire tumor. This technique obviates the need for invasive surgery, carries a low morbidity and provides an excellent curative outcome in the majority of cases. Treatment of EPLP is varied and is dependent on the size, extent, and local growth pattern of the lesion. In cases where the lesion is confined to the mucosa, the lesion can be endoscopically resected using the full endoscopic mucosal resection. For large lesions that involve the entire submucosal layer, a standard lateral esophagotomy, enucleation, or a segmental transverse esophageal resection can be performed. If the lesion is large and extensive and has a suspected vascular component, a thoracoscopic enucleation or segmental resection may be considered. These techniques carry low morbidity and excellent results with no
