■ The Will of the Elden King

With the Pandora's Box left behind at Hogwarts, the evil power of the Crimson Witch and the curse that she cast upon the world is slowly decaying. The end of the world has come.

Those who have survived are fighting against the Midnight Flower, a flower that is keeping them in a magical cocoon, and, at the same time, running from the devilish underworld, which is quickly erupting. The very next day, the monsters that have been sealed in the underworld break their golden cages and break their chains, and the underworld descends upon the lands between...

Instead of the elven kingdom where the power of the Elden Ring is strongest, it has been overtaken by the demonic underworld, and the battlefields of the land between is flooded with monsters of all types: Demihumans, Mythological Monsters, and even the Devil himself. The only ones who can dispel the fears and terror they conjure are the warriors of the land between, and they are called, the Tarnished.

They are more than monsters—they are your allies. It is their flesh that creates the armor you wear, their blood the weapon that you wield, and their spirits that support you in your quests. And so with body, with blood, and with spirit they offer you the strength to wield the power of the Elden Ring...

The fight in the lands between is spreading. The Elden blood that flows in you must be nourished. Your ancestors have laid the foundation for your strength, and the only thing left is for you to become an Elden Lord...

The proposal originally included the medical teams and equipment but those were reduced to be foot soldiers. (CNN) -- The Bush administration announced it will send two medical teams and a small support team to the Democratic Republic of Congo to help in the treatment of up to 20 Americans who survived this week's bombings in the city of Kinshasa. A State Department spokeswoman told reporters Monday that the U.S. had been working with other governments to help bring the victims home. The teams were to arrive in the Congo on Thursday, she said. "They will be arriving with the belongings of those who have been there, and they're going to be providing support to medical professionals, as well as making sure the families know where their loved ones are," she said. "This is a very dangerous area, and because of the threat of violence there, for security reasons, and we've been working in conjunction with a number of governments to try to make sure our people get out." American officials said Sunday it was unclear how many people have been caught up in the violence in the war-ravaged DR Congo. About 200,000 people have been killed since fighting broke out in December 2003, and more than two million have been displaced, according to the UN. The violence has triggered a cholera epidemic and led to the worst famine in the country since 1998, when the UN says as many as two million people died. The 26 people who have been helped so far are young, with an average age of 19 years old, the spokesman said. It is not clear where those who have been rescued are from, but the Foreign Ministry is trying to help them with their families, he said. The medical teams were to be comprised of 33 people -- 17 medical personnel, a nurse, eight emergency medical technicians and three chaplains and social workers, he said. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is concerned about their safety as they head to the site, he added. And the team will be entirely unarmed -- just as it was last time the American teams went into the Congo, in 2001. CNN's Jeanne Meserve contributed to this report.It is well known that the recovery of oil by use of a hot fluid (e.g., steam) will result in an increase in the viscosity of the oil. That is, at certain flow rates, the injection of steam into oil
