How Active Media Lifts Limbs? The Active Media system can lift all the limb(s) of your customers that are stuck in their seat and keep them up. To do this it needs to measure the distance between the seat and a fixed base. This is achieved by a magnetic field generator, a transmitter and a receiver or two, installed underneath the seat. The distance is then indicated in the device's screen. The activated system gives customers a gentle pressure, which is light enough to allow movement without overtraining muscles. It can be operated either manually or through the device's controller. The Active Media controller offers you a wide range of settings so that you can modify the device's parameters to your needs. You can even adjust the minimum and maximum distance between the seat and the fixed base. In addition, the controller offers a large number of programmable features and buttons, which make the system easy to set up and use. In case the receiver is positioned over the seat back, the controller can be set so that the system can lift the two seat backs (upper and lower). Anisotropic Mixing of Polymer Brushes in a Poorly Solvating Medium. We report anisotropic behavior of brushes at the liquid-liquid interface of dihexadecylidimethylammonium chloride and decane, in which the brush made of (polyethylene glycol) 4-hydroxybenzaldehyde (PEG) is localized at the interface of two miscible liquids (decane and dihexadecylidimethylammonium chloride) and anisotropic mixing is observed in the case of a brush is localized at the interface. The temperature dependence of the phase behavior of the PEG brush at the interface c6a93da74d
