in the end, each side may have had the right to protect its intellectual property, but both geiger and lotas saw the fight as too far. both admit that nike came for one of them and stopped at nothing to force the other to heel. but in the end, they both said they felt they lost more than they had gained by the fight. its all fun and games for the most part until you get really ugly lawsuits. and thats exactly what nikes legal team is doing against a couple of guys running a little business called air force 1 by niels. the company also has a gorillaz page for the same business. how the two came to be caught up in legal wrangling is pretty simple. one of the guys, luís esteves, was found to be selling unauthorized air force 1s online without nike's consent. but, esteves says, he always got the official nike logo when he ordered the shoes, the service was great, and the prices were fair. the two ended up settling the case in 2012 for just $40,000. but the settlement also raised questions about just how much nike knew about the unauthorized business and the guys involved. it also raised questions about just how much nike was willing to pay to shut down a fledgling business. older, and thus wiser, customers and sneakerheads can look back on the footwear industry of the past and wonder how such a massive, well-managed, and profitable company can have once been so weak. the question, of course, is whether this is some kind of darwinian process, or if it just simply resulted from a shortsighted business model that required nike to burn cash to sell its shoes. either way, the company certainly needs to adapt to its own undoing. the company is now facing an uphill battle in the fight to fight the footwear equivalent of heroin addiction, one that might cost it many millions.

in march, he re-released the watches. this time, though, the name is nike air. the sneaker air force one features a mesh upper, visible air cushioning in the midsole, and a "nike air" rubber outsole. a nike air force one will sell for $650, while an air force 1 "sneaker" model will sell for $550. the air force one is available in a variety of different colors, including black/white, burgundy/white, black/red and black/orange. the air force one will be available in nike stores at select locations and online beginning today. starting in the spring, customers can change the color of their nike id on nike.com by visiting nikeid.nike.com. customers can then use the nike id to create a unique username and password that is specific to them. the nike id does not replace the customer's primary nike account username and password, nor does it replace the customer's username and password associated with a third-party account, such as facebook, yahoo! or google. trending: carmakers are ditching car dealerships theres a reason for the unexpected backlash against the nike nmd line. it hasnt been revealed how the new sneaker, which has a sneaker-inspired midsole, would feel on a foot. the pressure sensitive tongue and translucent sidewalls, however, make it feel like an entirely different shoe. would you wear it? would you be caught dead in it? this might sound crazy, but geiger and his legal team are apparently planning to sue the dicks brand for naming their range of custom kicks after nike. lets be real, theyre not actually adidas. but they are the bane of nike and nikes customers alike. dicks claims its using nike ip, but its not clear exactly which nike ip its using. 5ec8ef588b
