in the prison, there's really no way of telling who's who, especially if you didn't watch the original episode. here's where the idea of a story within a story comes into play. we're constantly asked who's the guard and who's the inmate, a clever way to have both sides of the story explained. we hear both sides, and it's obvious that one of them is a great liar. from that point, we cut back into the families of cathy and pastor rufus and their involvement, which is just as brilliant. there's a big effort to protect r. kelly from the public, so his parents send out a tape to all the media outlets and bloggers, explaining his situation. they throw in a bunch of veiled references and blatant references to scientology, such as how they're known as "the family that raps," the music label they signed to and how cathy converted, which drives the entire episode. it also keeps the story's penultimate moment very tense, as cathy comes to r. kelly's home to confess her love for him. they're so caught up in the moment that they don't hear their neighbor's husband (who they later meet in a restaurant) bang on his door, presumably to ask what's going on. on the flip side of the extremely serious newtrailisthat's what it's all about for r. kelly, though, the music is awfully catchy. the first 10 minutes are a sample musical set up, complete with a theme song and costume changes. (a few of the later videos use the same sample, which has been looped for the last five years of the series. it might be time to replace the faux song that's been the show's mainstay. and all of that music helps make some of the comedy sharper, providing a sharp counter to the unshaven, clearly preoccupied r. kelly. on the new videos, he's shaken up by how he's started acting like he's a character from the songs he's written. while one of the new songs appears to be about another woman who caught his eye, the narrative is as diffuse as ever (see below).

ulaby: there was one moment fans realized r. kelly could really sing. he's on stage with a cast of characters, like a preacher, a black doctor, a stewardess, a hairdresser and a side of beef. they're all preparing for an impromptu wedding, complete with a mass-produced cake. the bride and groom are playing house, but r. kelly's in a tuxedo. he's singing the wedding march. the audience goes wild. i said to r. kelly, are you singing that? he said, yeah, i'm getting married, have a good time. and the audience went wild. ulaby: at that point, r. kelly made clear, this isn't a fashion show or a wedding video. this is trapped in the closet, and it's not going to stop. in fact, the way r. kelly positions his characters, you'll notice they're all wide-eyed, confused, self-conscious. that's the opposite of the way he looks. he's the cool kid in the room, and the audience knows it. that's what makes this unlike most music videos. it's filled with real urban grit. r. kelly wants us to watch this and feel uncomfortable about our own sexuality. this isn't a fantasy, this is a cautionary tale. it's a man taking away the perfect woman and giving her to someone who's far from perfect. and r. kelly, that's the whole point. and if that's not disturbing enough, trapped in the closet rewinds and shows us how the perfect woman ends up with the wrong guy. in the film, the show goes on, with r. kelly singing, growling, and in full-on disco mode, mocking the groom. but this isn't a show. this is theater. and this is r. kelly's last word on love and monogamy. the last part is the most theatrical. he loses it when the bride says she's pregnant. r. kelly tries to excuse himself, but the groom says he's pregnant too. the wedding is called off. the groom says r. kelly needs to find another man. 5ec8ef588b
