A few hours later, we were all seated around the table, including the President and I were discussing the details of peace talks. After about half an hour, Ury raised his hand, and the President said to me, Ury, what is it that concerns you? The President seemed surprised. But he listened to Ury for nearly an hour, carefully answering all of the questions posed by Ury. In retrospect, the President could have used a machine to listen to Ury. After all, this is how we used to listen to speeches in our country. Through the voice of the president, the country heard a comforting message of peace and then listened to a realistic approach to finding a solution. And yet, Ury had done all the heavy lifting. In essence, we should use machines like Ury to help us listen. Imagine that everyone around you is speaking loudly. To you, they're just another crowd of people talking at you. But what if you had some medium that you could use to hear others? Ury was that medium. And the President of Venezuela was able to think like Ury to listen to Ury to learn about his people. To him, it was a luxury. To us, it's a necessity. The second important reason for listening is that you might learn something about yourself. In the course of listening, you will find things that you never knew you felt, even things you never knew you felt. How can you better understand and solve problems if you don't know what your problems are? Once a threat is convicted of being malicious, Defenders need to know the context and other correlated events to deconstruct the entire operation. Cyberason EDR implements machine-learning based deduction to find other artifacts of the operation that are connected to the initial event and compose an automated timeline for rapid response.
