Swat 4 Nude Patch REPACK

the team behind the latest update to the popular free software foundation's gnu distribution have released a patch for the distribution that should allow users to replace the operating system's firmware with a new version that has been created to patch the kernel. in a statement released through the free software foundation, the organization that maintains the distribution, martin pitt said the patch would address a "gaping security vulnerability" in the operating system that can be used to gain access to the root file system. the vulnerability was found by italian security researcher filippo valsorda, who had previously discovered a similar vulnerability in the phrack magazine. the vulnerability exists in the underlying operating system's firmware used to control the wireless networking card. according to the security researchers, the patch could be rolled out to the distribution in the next few weeks, and if it is approved by the fsf's "documentation review team" it could be officially released in the next version of the distribution. with the release of the patch, the kernel version in the distribution has been updated to 2.6.26.4. previous versions of the distribution's kernel have included an operating system known as netbsd, which contains some features that are not included in other operating systems such as linux. the security patch has been created by the security team at red hat, the organization behind the fedora operating system. the development of the patch was funded by red hat, which has been working with the free software foundation to improve the security of its products.
